Description of the Related Art There is conventionally known an image forming apparatus including a guiding mechanism for guiding a sheet member conveyed from a feed section to a fixing section in order to allow the sheet member to be positively separated from the feed section and guided without any skew while passing through an image forming section. An example of this type of guiding mechanism includes a feed belt assembly incorporating a feed belt having a plurality of slide grooves formed in the circumferential direction along the longitudinal direction thereof. The feed belt is brought into pressure contact with a reference surface (detent surface) formed at a predetermined position of a sidewall of a guide guide member disposed in a lower side portion of the image forming section to press the sheet member against the reference surface. The slide groove is formed in the feed belt at an end region opposite to an end region pressed against the reference surface, and an upper wall of the slide groove contacts the reference surface along the slide groove. Thus, the sheet member is pressed against the reference surface and guided along the reference surface in a state in which the sheet member is held by the feed belt. In this example, the reference surface is formed in the form of an L shape along
