Finding the needle in the haystack: Randomised controlled trial of introduction of online peer-led psycho-education to support young men's mental health and wellbeing. Men's mental health, particularly in adolescence, remains a significant public health issue, particularly for young men. Online peer-led psycho-education has demonstrated to be a feasible, acceptable and potentially effective method for young men to access care and support. To evaluate the potential effectiveness of online peer-led psycho-education (N = 685) as a method to support young men's mental health and wellbeing using a primary care recruited and randomised controlled trial. Participants completed online questionnaires at baseline, 12 and 18 weeks. Participants who screened positive for suicidal ideation at baseline and experienced depression or anxiety within the 12-week follow-up period were randomised to online peer-led psycho-education or a control condition. Primary outcomes included depression and anxiety. Baseline characteristics were also assessed. Compared with the control condition, participants randomised to online peer-led psycho-education had significantly better depression symptoms (B = -2.77; 95% confidence interval, -4.21 to -1.33) and anxiety symptoms (B = -2.57; 95% confidence interval, -4.09 to -1.05) at 12-week follow-up. A significant interaction effect was found between intervention and follow-up time for anxiety symptoms (B = 1.06; 95% confidence interval, 0.34 to 1.80) and suicidality (B = 0.37; 95% confidence interval, -0.17 to 0.91). Findings from this trial suggest that online peer-led psycho-education may be a feasible and acceptable method for young men to access care and support.
