Key Features: Fast imaging time Image editing tools Fully portable Gnome and KDE What's New: 1.0.9.1Liver transplantation is safe and effective for hepatocellular carcinoma patients without macroscopic vascular invasion. Hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) is the main cause of liver-related death. Recurrence rates are high after liver resection. Liver transplantation (LT) is associated with good oncological outcomes; however, there is controversy in the debate of whether LT can be considered for patients without macroscopic vascular invasion. From November 2001 to October 2011, we retrospectively analyzed 17 patients with the diagnosis of HCC without macroscopic vascular invasion who underwent LT. Ten patients had a single HCC ≤ 5 cm, while 7 patients had 2 or more small tumors (2-3 cm). Demographic, clinical, and oncological data were collected and compared with those of 2 matched control groups: patients with HCCs that did not receive LT (HCC-LT), and patients with HCC-LT and a tumor > 5 cm. No patients had macroscopic vascular invasion (Portal vein [PV] thrombosis [$n = 0$], PV invasion [$n = 0$], or extrahepatic invasion [$n = 0$]). No patient underwent major hepatectomy. After LT, 2 patients had intra-abdominal or chest HCC recurrence, and 1 had an additional lung metastasis. Cumulative 1-, 3-, and 5-year patient and graft survival rates were 100%. The median and mean recipient survival rates were 6.5 (range, 0.17-25.3) and 8.6 (range, 1.2-28.5) months, respectively. The corresponding mean and median graft survival rates were 15 (range, 6.2-32) and 19 (range, 6.2-32) months. Patient and graft survivals after LT were similar to those of HCC-LT and HCC-LT+ > 5 cm, which is in contrast to the worse patient survival observed in the LT group for HCC-LT (P 5 cm (P
