Altered expression and distribution of nucleoprotein phosphorylation sites in nuclei of allograft-primed lymphocytes. Immune effector mechanisms of graft rejection may be related to lymphokine-induced expression of nucleoprotein phosphorylation sites in an altered intracellular distribution of antigen- and/or superantigen-specific proliferation. We have investigated the expression of the nucleoprotein phosphorylation sites, oligomeric phosphate (PO4), in GVH-specific proliferating splenocytes, in an energized lymphocyte population, and in allograft-primed lymphocytes. We found that lymphokines such as IFN-gamma or IL-2 or allogeneic B cell superantigens triggered in vitro up-regulation of PO4 expression in the proliferating splenocytes without a substantial redistribution of PO4 to the nuclei. Stimulation by IL-4 of GVH-primed lymphocytes or allogeneic B cell superantigen of the GVH-primed lymphocytes had no effect on PO4 expression. PO4 expression was observed in a majority of both interphase and metaphase chromosomes irrespective of the antigens used and was the lowest in H-9 cells, which have only one chromosome 9. These studies demonstrate that phosphorylation of the nucleosomal proteins is a general phenomenon in T and B cells that occurs irrespective of the specific antigen and can be induced by more than one cytokine.
