A significant problem facing the state of Maryland and its citizens is the urban decay within its towns and cities. There is a steady decline in the quality of life for its citizens and it is important to stem this flow of change that is sucking Maryland into a dark and foreboding future. There is a growing social science research that shows that urban decay is not just a physical deterioration of the urban environment but also in people's lives. We see it with the breakdown of family structures as a result of parents leaving the home and children struggling to find a place of their own. Then, when people leave the homes that they have been raised in and move to other towns and cities, they bring the dysfunction that they experienced at home with them. We see urban decay in the unemployment, crime, and dropping education and health scores of its citizens. These are important issues that need to be addressed in order to stem the tide of decay in the suburbs of Maryland. One problem that has existed for many years is the way in which our cities have been governed. We have seen many cities take on a large array of problems and the citizens who are paying taxes have no control over how their city is being run. One of the great ideas that could stem the tide of decay and revitalize our state and its cities is to elect mayor and city council. The current system, with mayors appointed by the Governor, ignores the needs of the citizens and does nothing to help them. The people who are appointed to these positions are representatives of the state, not of the people. This is a great idea for resolving the cities of Maryland that are already struggling, but it would be irresponsible to leave the cities that have seen their quality of life rise from despair to the brink of
