Download BoschEsiKts540TronicCrackPatchepub .Introduction {#sec1-1} ===== The first description of the Chiari type I malformation was by Dr. Franco Chiari in 1883. His case report was associated with the spontaneous recanalization of a right-sided posterior communicating artery aneurysm. Other reasons for the development of this lesion include brainstem compression by an enlarged sac of the caudal part of the posterior fossa (pontine and cerebellum), excessive growth of the occipital bone, and lack of bony fusion between the occipital and the atlas or axis vertebrae. Congenital malformations of the occipital bone, such as occipital encephaloceles and basioccipital encephaloceles, have also been described in association with the Chiari type I malformation. In 1924, McIntosh and Leach reported a similar condition caused by congenital fusion of the atlas and axis. More than half of all cases of Chiari type I malformation occur de novo, and neuroimaging is required to establish the diagnosis. MRI is the diagnostic imaging modality of choice. Treatment consists of cervical laminectomy to decompress the brainstem and cerebellum. If the associated syringomyelia is present, it should be decompressed as well. Only a small proportion of these patients have undergone surgery, and no uniform guidelines exist for treatment of such patients. Case Report {#sec1-2} ===== A 16-year-old boy presented with progressively worsening headache. There was no history of trauma or fever. There was no history of loss of consciousness, seizures, or symptoms of raised intracranial pressure. The duration of symptoms was 2 years, and the patient had been prescribed analgesics. However, he did not get relieved of his symptoms. Headache was associated with diplopia and ataxia. On examination, there was no café-au-lait spots. Fundus examination revealed bilateral papilledema. Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the brain

Where the district court fails to mention a factor listed in § 5K2.1 or a corresponding amendment to the Guidelines, "we will remand unless the record makes clear the court's reasons for the decision, and that the court would have made the same decision absent the invalid factors." United States v. Gomez, 50 F.3d 279, 281 (8th Cir. 1995). Here, the district court relied on five separate factors. We find that the district court stated sufficient reasons for the decision it reached. We refuse to speculate as to what factors would have influenced the district court's decision. We find that the record makes clear the district court's reasons for the decision it made and, thus, we reject Davis's argument that the district court clearly erred in determining that Davis was not entitled to a downward departure. Finally, Davis argues that the district court erred in setting Davis's base offense level at 38, rather than 34, with a three-level reduction for acceptance of responsibility. Because Davis did not present this argument in the district court, we review for plain error. See United States v. Merritt, 982 F.2d 305, 306 (8th Cir. 1992) (per curiam). To establish
