20 real-life professional footballers were used to develop the system, with some of the most senior players included in the training sessions used to create the player models. In-game representation of real-world player data when using the “HyperMotion Technology.” The left side of the screen is used to represent the player model’s positioning. On the right, player animations are shown. In FIFA 22, you can get a more accurate representation of what the ball will do when it's in the air, through the use of simulation models. An example of this is the “Lateral pass.” It allows you to see how the player acts on the ball, as it comes to him or her on the pitch. The aim of the game is to improve the gameplay of the real-life moves that are displayed in the game. In FIFA 22, in some cases, the ball is a lot more visible, and the players look better on the field. An example of this is the “Endzone Sequence,” which allows you to see all of the movements of the players as they run into the field before a pass is played. The “Endzone Sequence” allows you to see the ball movements that occur before a pass is made. Based on the real-life action of the player, the pass is simulated. For example, if the ball is placed out wide, then the player will be positioned behind the ball. However, the player will have the ball in front of him or her, so a pass can be played towards the player. In “HyperMotion,” the player will perform all of the actions that are in motion capture suits, for example, if a player is rushing towards the ball, an animation in the game will display this. Theoretically, this will take the experience of the FIFA game to a different level, where you can watch a first-person view of a player executing the task, instead of just a sequence of animation. You can compare the real-
