What's new:

A nature park is a public park used for recreation that includes a notable percentage of natural features, emphasizing the preservation of biological diversity. The term was first used in Norway, and first appeared in the English-speaking world in the 1980s. Usually these parks have a tourist focus (such as a visitors center, access roads, etc.) in contrast to most other parks and recreational areas. Although there are many internationally known nature parks, only a few dozen (at least 250) are deemed to be "great" or "world-class". The Birds of North America identify 115 sites as "nature parks", but generally these are small, localised sites, and only a few are "Great lakes and uplands". In contrast, great loughs and loughs in Ireland and Great Britain are often emphasised as nature parks, and in northern Europe there are many national parks. In the UK many regional parks have "nature" sections. Canada has many state parks and provincial parks which have been designated as "nature parks". A few of these are parks that contain only natural features such as waterfalls, mountains, and islands, and only others occur in a continuous, natural landscape. Sometimes these are usefully classified according to three main types: true nature parks and biospheres, where nature is the primary focus, other parks are more humandesigned and tourist-conscious, and, finally, there are parks that are more like large, remote state parks; there the emphasis is on their nature, but without the human intervention inherent in parks of the first two types. Similar "offthe-beaten-track" parks are found in many other parts of the world. Some other nature parks are: Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge in Virginia; Georges Island National Park, New Zealand; Everglades National Park in Florida; Guadalupe-Nipomo Dunes National Wildlife Refuge in California; Kwadacha Ecological Reserve in Canada; Mount Edith Cavell National Park, Australia; Park of American Forests, Greece; Zion and Bryce Canyon National Parks in Utah; Waimangu Volcanic Valley, New Zealand, Some governmental sites and features are nature parks as a misnomer, where strict nature policies and practices are less paramount. Biosphere reserves are designated areas with a strict conservation policy. Great Barrier Reef Marine
