What's New in the Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.1.0)?

Q: RSpec and Capybara, why do we have to use should_not in protected when a test does not use the'should' keyword? I am using Rspec and Capybara, and I was trying to write a test for the feature and scenarios I will be writing - which is how this particular scenario will work, but I'm just wondering if my thinking is correct. If a test contains'should' or'should_not' or'must_not' it means that if it doesn't occur the test fails, for example: ... expect(page).to have_selector('id','myid') ... However, if a test contains'should_not' (and there is no other word to indicate negation) then if the test does not happen the test fails - for example: ... expect(page).should_not have_selector('id','myid') ... My question is, why is this required? Wouldn't it be enough to say that the test should not have the id element? A: I don't know Capybara, but I'll take a shot at this. Imagine that the test is: expect(page).should have_selector('id','myid') expect(page).should_not have_selector('id', 'non_existent_id') If this test passes, then we can be sure that the first expectation (to have_selector) will pass - the page will have the element "id" with the id "myid" and nothing more. The second expectation will cause the test to fail: the page will have the element "id" with the id "non_existent_id" and nothing more. and not the one for which you've been preparing. It's easy to forget that as we become so used to the new version that we've been getting ready for. After all, we've been reading, writing, preparing, and practicing. We've been making samples, practicing and honing skills. We've been focusing on the more
