The authors have studied, in rabbits with uveitis induced by perfusion of endotoxin in the anterior chamber, the changes occurring in the lens with isolated ageing, without involving other ocular tissues. The following studies were performed, during and after endotoxin perfusion: determination of changes in the refractive index, and in the volume of the lens; measurement of the aqueous humor protein content and pressure; and a morphological study of the lens. The results suggest that the inflamed lens is subject to increased refraction due to changes in the protein content of the aqueous humor and the elevation of the aqueous humor pressure which occurs in uveitis.
