Curable, stable secondary paradoxical embolism is a well-recognized pathophysiologic phenomenon. Transvenous patent foramen ovale (PFO) closure has been developed as a treatment for this condition. However, the small size of the available devices, the risk of infection, and the need for a transseptal puncture complicate this approach. An animal model of secondary paradoxical embolism has been developed to test noninvasive endoluminal techniques for PFO closure. A canine model of secondary paradoxical embolism was created in which the PFO was opened surgically and closed by permanent occlusion. Next, a prototype of a new transatrial and transaortic occluding device was placed endoluminally in the atrium and aorta, respectively. The occlusion of the PFO was confirmed at autopsy by direct visualization. Atrial and transaortic endoluminal placement of the device were achieved in the canine. At autopsy the dogs were neurologically normal and there were no instances of device dislodgement. The dimensions of the aortic and atrial prototypes matched the sizes of the canine aorta and left atrium, respectively. The new transatrial and transaortic occlusion device is a promising device for noninvasive closure of patent foramen ovale in humans. This invention relates to an optical pickup apparatus such as a compact disk player or the
