The removal of heavy metals by immobilized microbial cells cultured in a medium containing heavy metals is a subject of continuing interest. Here, Cd(II) and Pb(II) were found to be taken up by immobilized cells of Pseudomonas fluorescens ATCC 17400. In samples containing Cd(II), up to 80% of the added Cd(II) was removed by cells cultured in a medium containing only 50  $\mu\text{mol l}^{-1}$  CaCl<sub>2</sub> and HEPES buffer (150  $\text{mmol l}^{-1}$  NaNO<sub>3</sub>), pH 7.0, with no other nutrient added. In samples containing both Cd(II) and Pb(II), uptake of Pb(II) also occurred, but with up to 20-fold less efficiency compared to Cd(II) removal. Removal of both heavy metals increased with increasing pH between 5 and 10. The form of the heavy metals taken up depended on the number of heavy metals present in the sample. Experiments to determine the mode of heavy metal uptake by immobilized cells showed that cells grown in a medium containing Cd(II) released the metal into the surrounding solution; no evidence of metal uptake was obtained when the metal was added directly to cells grown in nutrient-rich medium. Pb(II) uptake by immobilized cells was highly energy-dependent, whereas, Cd(II) uptake was

There is still a hunger for that one-pot dish, the amazing griddle cakes or the wonderfully simple curry. How can you eat just one dish when there's still so much of India to explore? Fortunately, there are travel companies around the world that are going beyond the Indian sweet and savoury to cater to our unique needs. From the Kaju Paneer served up at the Kinara restaurant in Shillong, northern India to the mange tout curry offered at the Istana Spice restaurant in Jakarta, Indonesia, both have enough to satisfy all of our desires. The local state government is so proud of its Kaju Paneer that they have named it as the "breakfast of the nation". You can have it with some bread and yoghurt, or just some steamed rice - the creamy, pan-fried paneer (cheese) really complements both. It's just a bit hard to find outside of the state.
