How can I make sure those updates will occur on a regular basis? A: If you want to make sure you always get the latest updates, you need to use the "autoupdate" setting in the ClearFox preferences. You can find this setting under the "Advanced" tab. To do this, right click on the ClearFox icon in the system tray and choose 'Preferences' -> Advanced -> Autoupdate and make sure the setting is set to 'Automatic updates'. Now that you are set up, you will always be getting automatic updates and new versions of your browser. Update After reading the comment by arqisi below, you might want to uninstall the latest version of the browser and install the version that is shipped with your Linux distribution. This will, however, mean that you have to update all your programs every time that you update the browser. So, to avoid having to do this manually, you can use a script like this: #!/bin/bash # apt-get update apt-get install $1 Then, just run the script and then every time you run the browser it will install the latest version of the browser. This way you always have the latest version of the browser installed, but you don't need to uninstall and reinstall the browser every time you want to run the browser. The scripts can be downloaded from sourceforge, and here are a couple of different scripts that you could download: Of those, I recommend 'Script on Six' as they seem to have the scripts that you need to perform the update (apt-get and aptitude update). Summer, 2013 The Grateful Dead were at a crossroads in 1993. On the one hand, fans were clamoring for a new album, and they came to realize that this was due not to a dearth of music, but to the band's successful business strategy. In a 2003 interview with Dead and Company frontman John Mayer, guitarist Bob Weir commented that in 1992 they had planned to release "Double Dutch" during summer 1993, but were persuaded against it by Warner Brothers, who argued that they needed to remain in the Warner Brothers era,
