Q: Formula for the distance from the origin to a point on a line? I'm trying to implement a game in java where the player's movements can be any combination of a,b,c,d keys. Each key will move them up, down, left, and right, and the movement is handled by moving the player's vector. I want to be able to calculate the distance from the origin to the point the player is standing at, and move accordingly, but the only distance formula I've seen that would work for this situation is:  $\text{distance} = \cos(\text{angle}) * \text{radius}$  which is, as I understand, not the best way to do it. A: I would just use the Pythagorean Theorem. You can just use the following to get the distance of any point on a line from the origin and the angle between that point and the origin:  $\text{distance} = \text{Math.sqrt}(x * x + y * y)$

The goal of clinical trials is to determine whether a new intervention is effective. If a new intervention is truly effective, then it should be superior to an existing intervention, but there is insufficient data to know whether this is the case. Likewise, if the new intervention is not effective, the results should be similar to, or worse than, existing interventions. Thus, clinical trial data should be used to determine whether a new intervention is superior or inferior to an existing intervention. In this article, I argue that clinical trial results cannot be used to make such assertions, but instead should be used to determine the level of uncertainty regarding the truth of this assertion. I provide an example of how uncertainty could be described and the results used to assess relative effectiveness of an existing intervention versus the intervention under study.Q
