The National Committee for Defending Prisoners' Rights in Palestine - an NGO dedicated to advocating for the rights of Palestinian prisoners - has taken their claim to court as a response to the Israeli Ministry of Education's so-called Law of Entry to Information Sources. The bill was ostensibly introduced in an attempt to "ensure the protection of minors from modern forms of sedition" but in reality, the bill tries to enforce Israel's increasingly ideological military laws. Adalah, the legal centre for Arab minority rights in Israel, submitted an application to the High Court of Justice in Jerusalem on behalf of six children arguing that Israel's school system and textbooks fail to 'conform' with Israeli legislation. The court documents are non-final appeals against the State education ministry's decision to allow information in textbooks and other educational materials to be "subject to approval by the Minister of Defence." Israel's citizenship laws, the High Court ruled in January, "contain an arbitrary component, and are therefore invalid and unconstitutional in part". The decision to strip over 1.8 million Palestinian citizens of Israel of their basic rights came after the former Supreme Court Justice Salim Joubran ruled that the "special regime" for Israeli Jews in the country's laws violated basic constitutional principles of equal protection and equality of citizenship. The Israeli court has also ruled that the country's laws can be applied to any Israeli citizen who enters the occupied Palestinian territory illegally. 'Israel's laws apply to everyone living in the country's territory, even if they are in the West Bank or Gaza strip', said the ruling by the Israeli Supreme Court. "The Trump administration has signed a waiver that enables Israel to continue providing economic and military aid to Jordan while the two countries continue to pursue and enforce a peace agreement, which Jordan has already said it cannot accept," said a spokeswoman for the State Department. "America will not accept that any state ignores international law, undermines peace efforts, or fails to live up to its responsibilities in a close ally," she added

Can anyone help me out with this? A: C++/CLI codepatterns builtin a feature to allow a developer to have an unmanaged or unmanaged DLL in managed C++ code. Basically, such an inclusion follows the basic rules of a managed C++ source file. While it isn't necessary to know this, the feature has its own syntax which is explained here: // There are three kinds of builtin include files: // // public header // private header // external header // // The "public" builtin include file is required, and the public namespaces // exported from the public header are on the search path. // // The "private" builtin include file provides the ability to import private // (internal) members and classes. Note that it is possible to also define // public namespaces on the search path via the public include files. The // "external" builtin include file is required if the header file is not in // the namespace which contains the class. The external include files will // only be imported if the importing namespace and external include file have // the same casing. // // Example: // // #include "MyClass.h" // //
