What's new in CubeHub:

The 3D Solar System Simulator is an educational 3D planetarium program that allows a user to explore different parts of the Solar System using astronomical simulations. The program was developed by Tom A. Ross. It is notable for being one of only a few planetarium software programs that can change real time astronomical data from Earth to other planets, depending on the program settings. It is aimed at children and teens, but is also used by adults. The 3D Solar System Simulator was released by Professors' Software for the Apple Macintosh platform. It includes a full text book. A Windows version was available, but it was no longer supported. Simulations The 3D Solar System Simulator allows 3D modeling of planets, starfields and the Earth at different configurations, including with the Sun located in different parts of the Solar System. An example of the three dimensional map of the Solar System created with the program's user-friendly GUI has been featured in the Smithsonian Magazine. As the program allows the changing of the galaxy, nebulae, time and the luminosity of the stars, it can replicate different epochs and star configurations. The program also allows for instantaneous simulations using realistic astronomical numbers. A user can be given an option to select which object in the Solar system is to be observed and the planetarium includes 41.9 million stars with different brightness levels and kinds, including planets. Background The 3D Solar System Simulator has been praised as one of the most user-friendly planetariums. It can be tailored according to the user's needs in three different aspects: the type of simulation, the time period and the scope of the sky. The user can, for example, select objects and time periods, and the user is invited to choose from 5,100 solar systems, including their orbiting time and distance from the Sun. By using these presets, it is possible to observe a solar system as if it's located in the center of the Earth. The program does not have a star catalogue, nor does it generate realistic orbits. Realistic orbits is a trade-off in the case of the program, but the program does allow users to preview parts of the sky up to 400 times per second. Set the duration of the simulation, the time and the part of the sky that will be observed, the program can calculate all the objects that the user needs to see. Users can observe the Solar System and constellations, which are counted as a form of astronomical research,
