Key. [x32]?.Image copyright Jeff Brady Image caption Shani Britton, 22, has been separated from her partner for more than a month A gay women has been separated from her partner for a month while checks are carried out to see if she is HIV positive. Shani Britton, 22, who has spent more than £1,500 on her treatment to date, said the situation had been "absolutely terrifying". She said healthcare professionals had told her that unless she separated from her partner, she would be forced to wait until her monthly cycle returned. The Equality Commission said while this was not unlawful discrimination, it was "incredibly upsetting". Ms Britton said the process was "demeaning and harrowing". "I'm told that they want to see if I'm pregnant because if I am pregnant they don't necessarily need to test me," she told BBC Radio 2's Appeal programme. "At the same time they can't diagnose HIV. They don't have the exact testing tool that they need to test me." The NHS has told Ms Britton that in Wales it is unlawful to act on the basis of sexual orientation. In a ruling in 2007, the European Court of Human Rights said discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation was "incompatible with a democratic society" and that it was unacceptable to limit access to health services on that
