The modern medical approach to the child with sleep-related breathing disorders. The development of local hypoxic ventilation via the upper airway obstruction of the form that occurs in obstructive sleep apnea is likely to have occurred before the evolution of bipedalism. Consequently, pediatric development is expected to be associated with many features of morphology, physiology, and biologic development that predispose to the occurrence of hypercapnic and hypoxic ventilatory disorders. A high incidence of sleep-related disturbances has long been reported in preschool children. Subsequently, it was recognized that sleep-related breathing disorders are common (perhaps universal) phenomena in childhood, the size of the abnormal respiratory events increasing as the child matures. These data were accorded support by large epidemiological studies, in which large populations of children were examined, in which the prevalence of sleep-related breathing disorders in preschool-aged children was more than 100%. Children with sleep-related breathing disorders have other familiar features. One of the most common is a history of wheezing, and they also frequently report allergies and symptoms suggestive of gastroesophageal reflux. These features are usually associated with food allergies, and thus assessment and avoidance of potential triggers (eg, cow's milk) have been recommended. The etiology, prevalence, prognosis, and treatment of the most common form of pediatric sleep-related breathing disorder, obstructive sleep apnea, have been well studied, and positive airway pressure therapy is the mainstay of treatment. Oropharyngeal factors are central in the pathogenesis of all forms of sleep-related breathing disorders, and are discussed as they relate to other pediatric (eg, respiration-related, nongenetic conditions) and adult (eg, obesity) conditions./*
