Such devices may deliver therapy to various locations of the heart, such as the atria and/or ventricles, to provide stimulation or to sense or record natural occurring events, such as depolarizations of the heart associated with an atrial or ventricular contraction. Implantable devices, such as pacemakers and implantable cardioverter-defibrillators, provide therapeutic electrical stimulation to the heart in a variety of ways. A pacemaker, for example, may be used to maintain a desired heart rate by delivering stimulation pulses in the absence of such natural pacing signals. An ICD may include one or more sensors that may be used in detecting abnormal cardiac activity and delivering a shock to the heart to treat the detected abnormal activity. An ICD may be coupled to one or more modules that are implanted into the body to detect abnormal activity and deliver a shock. In some embodiments, the ICD may detect abnormal activity based on the sensing of intrinsic depolarizations of the heart. Detecting a depolarization of the heart that is sensed within the ICD, or that occurs due to external depolarizations sensed by the implanted modules, may initiate delivery of a therapeutic pulse by the ICD. A common medical procedure for the treatment of abnormal cardiac activity includes applying a series of electrical pulses to the heart to restore the heart's synchronous pumping function. The electrical pulses may be delivered to the heart by an ICD. An exemplary ICD is shown in U.S. Patent Application Publication 2004/0179587, which is incorporated herein by reference in its entirety. A pulse generator of an ICD may be powered by a rechargeable battery. The output current of the pulse generator, and thus the battery's power drain, may be kept at a minimum. Where the power drain is extremely small, for example, in the range of 0.5 to 1.5 mA, an external ICD charger (EIC) may be coupled to the pulse generator and used to recharge the battery. EICs, as they exist today, are complex and expensive

Navigation systems are used in many types of vehicles and are also used to guide individuals as they travel along the streets or other thoroughfares. Such navigation systems typically compute a route from a starting position to a destination position using one or more computers that determine a series of waypoints and other data (such as routes, addresses, map data, etc.) that are relevant to the route. The navigation systems then indicate to the user when the vehicle has passed the waypoints on the route. One difficulty in designing navigation systems is determining how to guide the user through an unfamiliar area. If the user is unfamiliar with the area, the user can become disoriented and/or lost. For example, if the user is driving a vehicle in a town or city, the user may be 6d1f23a050
