As a method for providing an optical element such as a light-emitting diode with an optical coupling structure for connecting an optical fiber or an optical fiber cable, the so-called flip-chip bonding method for bonding and fixing an optical element to a support substrate with a gold-aluminum bonding material has been developed and has been employed in practice. The flip-chip bonding method is performed by bonding an optical element to a support substrate with a gold-aluminum bonding material and heating the support substrate and the optical element to the bonding temperature so as to heat-press the optical element to the support substrate and, thereafter, cooling to complete the bonding. As a method for bonding an optical element on a support substrate with a gold-aluminum bonding material, for example, a method is known in which a support substrate is dipped into a gold-aluminum bonding material, and then heated to 500xc2x0 C. so as to heat the support substrate and the
