The sun line above the West Fourth Street Bus/Tram in Pittsburgh. Illustrating the process of solar power first had arrived in the Pennsylvania City. These panels have produced approximately 3.3 megawatts of electricity for 14,000 customers, saving the city and its customers $5 million a year. And at the time of the writing, the city has another 600 panels under construction. As a result, the city of Pittsburgh has been getting between $60,000 and $100,000 annually in property tax exemptions in the parish, according to Denise Fahn, the city's policy and legal advisor for renewable energy. It is, however, not the first time the city of Pittsburgh has been winning permission from the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission to get a tax break on solar-generated electricity. In 2016, the city entered into a 25-year tax-exemption agreement with local solar-power company Xcel Energy, a move that was later approved by the Public Utility Commission. Pittsburgh is not the only local government in the state tapping into this opportunity: in October, the city of Philadelphia announced a similar 20-year solar-power tax-exemption.

After a few days of tinkering he discovered the cause – fluctuations in his laptop’s CPU frequency. The video is possibly the coolest idea for a hack we’ve ever seen. François has uploaded it to his YouTube channel as a video that shows how the “little devil” turns a good hack bad. He has uploaded a stripped down.swf file of his hack, and a.docx file with instructions on how to replicate the hack in your own video editing software. The video itself is extremely informative – the CPU frequency fluctuations in various parts of the video and the corresponding visual changes that result are really quite remarkable – to see it for yourself just click play on the YouTube video at the bottom of this article. The hack is achieved by using FL Studio, and specifically the Flubaroo plugin which sets up an automatic step sequencer. The plugin detects the fluctuations in the CPU frequency and sets up a series of calculations to generate the same sort of effect that the Flair headsets are actually meant to do – make the background in the video appear to be in motion. You can check out François’ FL Studio tutorial on YouTube. The major downside is that the hack only works on a limited range of video editing software, specifically Adobe Premier and Adobe After Effects 6d1f23a050
