Alterations of viral antigens in human bone marrow cells during the proliferation of endogenous lymphoid cells. Antigens on exogenous and endogenous human lymphoid cells at the stage of the cell cycle were studied by autoradiographic and immunofluorescence methods with monospecific antisera raised against human leukosis virus (HLV) and human T-cell leukemia virus. On peripheral blood mononuclear cells, a large proportion of the granular cells were doubly labeled. Lymphoid cells proliferating in bone marrow contained HLV- and T-cell leukemia virus-like antigens.
